Gen. Von Beulow Who Leads Huns In Italy

As the Germans move on to new victories along the Italian front, so advances the glory of General Von Beulow, who commands the Austro-German forces on the Isonzo. The demoralization of whole corps of the Italian armies, which a few months ago were conducting a victorious offensive against the Austrians along the same line, has been due in no small degree to this commander, whose military achievements during the Great War mark him as one of the greatest generals of the Kaiser's army.

British Water Carriers More Fearless Than Kipling's Immortal Gunga Din

Rudyard Kipling immortalized the water carrier of the British Army in his poem Gunga Din, but this fictitious character with all his ennobling characteristics has been superseded in the European war by a more fearless and greater character. The water carriers of the British army are doing a work that is no less important to the fighting men than that of the ambulance corps or war nurses. The accompanying picture, taken by the British official photographer, shows a group of them on their way to the firing lines. The casks on their backs hold the water. These men are seen in the front rank at every engagement, notably in the recent drive of the British in France, where many were lost with the advance guard of the troops.
